The sister-in-law of a billionaire businessman is being sued by her former butler for making homophobic statements and forcing him to sleep on the floor, a lawsuit alleges.

Daisy Soros, who was married to the late brother of Hungarian investor George Soros, reportedly sometimes didn't pay her immigrant employee and made frequent lewd comments about his sexual orientation.

The butler, Zahair Mohammed, said that she treated him far worse than her white, heterosexual employees - despite her life's work being a fellowship program for immigrants to the United States and their children.

Mohammed, who is homosexual and a Trinidadian immigrant, said Soros' behavior made him feel 'like a slave', he told the NY Daily News.

For his entire first year working for Soros in her New York Fifth Avenue home, she forced him to sleep on the floor at the foot of her guest beds, Mohammed claims in his lawsuit filed on Thursday in a Manhattan court.

He eventually bought a $75 sleeping pad from Costco which reportedly served as his bed during that time. After threatening to quit due to the inhumane treatment, Soros convinced him to stay so that she might live longer, as part of his job required him to look after her physical health, it is claimed.

An added slap in the face, Mohammed says, was that white, straight employees at the home were allowed their own beds. Even Soros' poodle Tango was more valued in the home, he states.

'It was really painful because the dog was allowed to sleep on the bed — but not a black human being, a black immigrant,' he said.

Soros also allegedly made a number of homophobic statements to Mohammed.

Mohammed said he was 'disgusted' after Soros, 87, told him several times: 'It's better to be married to your husband than to go out there and get AIDS.'

When the butler complained about her hurtful statements, she reportedly told him to stop being a 'sissy' and 'be a man'.

He also says that Soros used her wealth to consistently belittle him and justify her treatment of him.

'I have money and I can treat people however I want and who gives a f! Don't you know who we are?' My last name is Soros and I know some very powerful people. You are nobody and I will fire you the next time you talk to me about anything that is not your fg business,' she reportedly yelled at Mohammed.

In September of 2016, he finally quit after becoming frustrated that he had not been paid in several days. He said that Soros' explosive behavior 'frightened' him.

In response to the allegations, Soros' representatives presented a text message from Mohammed from the summer before he quit, in which he thanks her for 'everything'.

Her lawyer, Dov Kesselman said via email: 'It is unfortunate that a disgruntled former part-time employee, who expressed his appreciation for Mrs. Soros's support on many occasions, is now engaged in a transparent attempt to extract money from Mrs. Soros with false allegations of discrimination.'

He continued: 'Mrs. Soros and her family deny these baseless allegations and believe her life's work to support immigrants to the U.S. says a lot more about who she is than a former part-time employee seeking a quick payday.'
